Picross Touch is a game I have spent a long time working on. I'm not sure if anyone but me saw it's potential, because I couldn't quite get it right. I have given this game to the developers before and they've put a ton of work into it. It was amazing to see how far they have progressed with it. The game may not be perfect but I believe it's close and if you know anything about me, you know what I can do when I'm passionate about something. This is about as passionate as I get when it comes to creating an easy to play and addicting puzzle game. I saw countless jokes about an iOS version of Picross, and honestly the idea did sound fun, but I am a perfectionist and wasn't prepared to publish an unfinished game. That's why I took it upon myself to figure out how to turn it into a great game and pretty much do it myself. I worked on this game using the Unity development engine, which is a very efficient development tool. The end result is the same but it's definitely not the same. I spent a lot of time tweaking the controls and made all the tiles much easier to look at. I also added some features that you won't find in Picross Touch such as custom tile sliders, additional signs, and groups. I have had this game saved on my iPad since its release, always on and ready for me at the start of each day. I finally decided that I can share it with more people and thought it would be a great opportunity to reward my wonderful fans and give them something special. Thank you all for your support. What's new in Trash Story Soundtrack:

Simulation at HPA The Science and Technology Department at the UK's HPA is developing an army with the capability to dominate off-the-shelf electronic battlefields. A new set of five demonstrations will demonstrate their latest technologies, which are being developed under the Cutting Edge: Simulation and Training (CESTA) programme. Subjected to a series of electrical storms and maelstroms, the helicopters are taken on a series of flight missions that test how well they can stay airborne, how they cope with charging storms and turbulence, and how well the crew locate the location of their aircraft on the battlefield from the air, via GPS and from the ground. Leading the CESTA programme is EM Hazards and Electromagnetic Effects Group (HEE), the electronics and communications protection branch of HPA's Science and Technology (ST) Department. Natalie Jackowska, EM Hazards, Electromagnetic Effects Group Group Leader, says: 'The first demonstration of EM Hazards is an essential part of the CESTA programme and will help us to gauge the viability and effectiveness of the technology being developed. This will be followed by four other demonstrations, which will measure and analyse the performance of the current hardware, as well as assess the potential for using the most promising development roadmaps.' Jackowska says that as communications technologies change and expand, the environment is becoming increasingly more crowded, complex and noisy. 'We have the opportunity to make effective use of the electromagnetic spectrum; harnessing the spectrum for military purposes has been known for many years,' she explains. 'In the last 100 years, we have seen transformational changes in the way radar and communications systems operate, enabling warfare to be conducted. 'This continually evolving technology is a vital part of modern warfare. Electromagnetic Hazards is a key component of our ability to conduct effective engagement as we project power, enhance decision making, and conduct our missions.' Wind shear on helicopter rescue missions can be challenging, even in calm conditions. Photograph: Dan Martin

From radar to combat applications The objectives of EM Hazards include developing and refining the remote sensing, propagation (the technology and science of how radar signals move), and electromagnetic effects associated with electromagnetic (EM) technologies used in military and security settings. To date, EM Hazards has investigated technologies for communication, surveillance, targeting systems (aimed at
