Scripting (programming language) AutoCAD has three scripting languages: Python, Tcl, and JavaScript. Python was introduced in AutoCAD 2007 and is a general purpose scripting language. It can be used for batch processing of data and tools, and in the pre-release version it was used to control applications. Tcl was also introduced in AutoCAD 2007 and is used for command-line applications and as a scripting language in AutoCAD's pre-release version. It has both interactive and batch uses. JavaScript was introduced in AutoCAD 2010 and is used to automate user interfaces and is used to create standalone applications.

AutoCAD also supports the use of Visual LISP and C++. Visual LISP The Visual LISP language has been included with AutoCAD since Autodesk began development in 1987. It has been the primary automation language and was used to develop many of the core AutoCAD features and many of the commercial extensions. Visual LISP was used to develop the development tools and interface used to create some of AutoCAD's features, as well as to control the application and implement features. Development tools The following development tools are provided as part of AutoCAD: Keymap Editor - Used to develop new, custom AutoCAD keymaps for new drawing features. Line Graphics - Used to create line and polyline graphics. Picture - Used to create graphics, for example, screenshots of windows. Style Editor - Used to create styles and templates. Text Editor - Used to create text objects. User Interface Design - Used to design and create user interfaces. Viewer -

Used to display drawings in a window. Compatibility issues When AutoCAD 2000 was introduced, it did not have a complete set of Direct3D features; therefore, many older hardware machines, including the ZX Spectrum, could not run AutoCAD 2000, and users were unable to use any features such as shadows, materials or textures. This was solved in later versions. In AutoCAD 2003, the newer version of Direct3D 8 and the version of DirectX 9 that it was using caused some problems with compatibility with older hardware. AutoCAD does not use a per-object renderer, so features such as shadows, and rendering in 32-bit color and with normal maps were not possible. Also, the engine used a "hard" water effect for ca3bfb1094
